REFLECTIONS OF FIFTY-NINE.

I'm growing old, I'm growing old,
My life's short tale is nearly told;
The locks that on my temples lay,
And my dark beard is turning gray;
My cheek and brow is furrowed dim,
And objects indistinctly swim
Before my vision, once so bright,
But now fast fading into night;
My nerveless limbs are parched and stiff,
And feeble tottering, seem as if
To court the earth, from whence they rose,
Anxious for their last, long repose.
Thus, as through all creation's range,
Time or myself hath wrought a change.
The step infirm, the form inclined,
The pensive, contemplative mind;
The sobered thought, the judgment cooled,
The tamed desire by reason ruled;
Prone to content, and loth to roam,
Pleased with the charms of blissful home.
These are the marks of Fifty-nine—
Reader, what years and thoughts are thine?

OSCAR.

I'D BE A RAY.

I'd be a ray—a solar ray,
To shoot through air and ether;
And dance away one endless day,
O'er highland, lawn and heather.

I'd be a ray—a lunar ray,
Reflecting Sol's bright beams;
And nightly stray the milky way,
To waken lover's dreams.

I'd be a ray—a stellar ray,
To ride on ocean's breast;
When lightnings play amid the spray,
And calm the soul to rest.

I'd be a ray—the morning ray,
To take the first sly peep;
Then like a fay so bright and gay,
I'd wake the world from sleep.

I'd be a ray—the evening ray,
O'er earth so mildly beaming;
And calm survey the twilight gray,
Each hill and iceberg gleaming.

I'd be a ray—the summer ray,
To ride on golden wing;
Or sweetly lay on new mown hay,
And hear blythe maidens sing.

I'd be a ray—the autumn ray,
To cheer 'mid nature's gloom;
And light the way when holiday
Makes man forget his doom.

I'd be a ray—the winter ray,
O'er glittering worlds to roam;
Then love obey and quiet stay,
Upon my hearth at home.

I'd be a ray—the sweet spring ray,
To gleam in April showers;
And view for aye the beauteous May,
And sport among the flowers.

I'd be a ray—soft Venus' ray,
To shine in ladies' eyes;
Who ne'er say nay when Love's the prey,
Whom they so idolize.

I'd be a ray—earth's humble ray,
On freedom's dome afar;
And there portray her potent sway,
O'er haughty king and Czar.

I'd be a ray—Religion's ray,
To shed true light abroad;
Then cease display and quit his clay,
To calmly rest with GOD.

The following sketch of an introduction to the Prince Regent of England, and of the throngs at the royal levee, is from Reid's Memoranda of a Residence at the Court of London:

A competent knowledge of the world may serve to guide any one in the common walks of life, wherever he may be thrown; more especially if he carry with him the cardinal maxim of good breeding every where, a wish to please, and unwillingness to offend. But if, even in private society, there are rules not to be known but by experience, and if these differ in different places, I could not feel insensible to the approach of an occasion so new to me. My first desire was, not to fail in the public duties of my mission; the next, to pass properly through the scenes of official and personal ceremony to which it exposed me. At the head of them was my introduction to the Sovereign. I desired to do all that full respect required, but no more; yet—the external observances of it—what were they? They defy exact definition beforehand, and I had never seen them. From the restraints, too, that prevailed in these spheres, lanses, if you fall into them, are little apt to be told to you, which increases your solicitude to avoid them. I had, in some of my intercourse, caught the impression that simplicity was considered best adapted to such an introduction; also, that the Prince Regent was not thought to be fond of set speeches. This was all that I could recollect. But simplicity, all know, is a relative idea. Often it is attainable, in the right sense, only through the highest art, and on full experience.

I arrived before the hour appointed. My carriage having the entre, or right to the private entrance, I went through St. James' Park, and got to Carlton House by the paved way, through the gardens. Even this approach was already filled. I was set down at a side door, where stood servants in the Prince's livery. Gaining the hall, persons were seen in various costumes. Among them were yeomen of the guard, with halberds in their hands; they had velvet hats with wreaths round them, and rosettes at their shoes. From the court yard, which opened through the columns of a fine portico, bands of musi were heard. Carriages, as in a stream, were approaching by this access through the double gates that separated the royal residence from the street. The company arriving by this access entered through the portico, and turned off to the right. I went to the left, through a vestibule leading to other rooms, into which none went but those having the entre. These consisted of cabinet ministers, the diplomatic corps, persons in chief employment about the court, and a few others, the privileged being in high esteem. Knights of the Garter appeared to have it, for I observed their insignium round the knees of several. There was the Lord Steward with his badge of office; the Lord Chamberlain with his golden wand and silver staff. The foreign ambassadors and ministers wore their national costumes; the cabinet ministers, such as we see in old portraits, with bag and sword; the lord chancellor, and other functionaries of the law, had black silk gowns, with full wigs; the bishops and dignitaries of the church, had aprons of black silk. The walls were covered with paintings. If these were historical, so were the rooms. As I looked through them, I thought of the scenes described by Doddington; of the Pelhams, the Bolingbrokes, the Hillsboroughs, of the anecdotes and personalities of the English court and cabinet in those days. The prince had not yet left his apartment. Half an hour went by, when Sir Robert Chester, master of ceremonies, said to me, that in a few minutes he would conduct me to the Prince. The Spanish Ambassador had gone in, and I was next in turn. When he came out, the master of ceremonies advanced with me to the door.

Opening it, he left me. I entered alone. The Prince was standing, with Lord Castlereagh by him. No one else was in the room. Holding in my hand the letter of credence, I approached as to a private gentleman, and said, in the common tone of conversation, that it was "from the President of the United States, appointing me their Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the court of his Royal Highness, and that I had been directed by the President to say, that I could in no way better serve the United States, or gain his approbation, than by using all endeavours to strengthen and prolong the good understanding that happily subsists between the two countries."

The Prince took the letter and handed it to Lord Castlereagh. He then said, that he would "ever be ready on his part to act upon the sentiments I had expressed; that I might assure the President of this, for that he sincerely desired to keep up and improve the friendly relations subsisting between the two nations, which he regarded as so much to the advantage of both." I replied, that I would not fail to do so.

The purpose of the interview seeming to be accomplished, I had supposed it would here end, and was about to withdraw, but the Prince prolonged it. He congratulated me on my arrival. He inquired for the health of Mr. Adams, and spoke of others who had preceded me in the mission, going back as far as the first, Mr. Pinckney. Of him, and Mr. King, his inquiries were minute. He made others, which it gave me still more pleasure to answer. He asked if I knew the ladies from my country, then in England, who had made such favourable impressions in their society, naming Mrs. Patterson, since Marchioness of Wellesley, and her sisters, the Miss Catons, of Maryland. I replied that I did, and responded to his gratifying notice of these my fair countrywomen. A few more remarks on the climate of the two countries, closed the audience.

It would be out of place in me to portray the exterior qualities of this monarch. The commanding union of them has often been mentioned; he was in his fifty-sixth year; but in fine health, and maintaining the erect, ambitious carriage of early life. I will only say, that he made his audience of foreign ministers a pleasurable duty to them, instead of a resolute ceremony. The Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Sicily and Naples, Count Ludolf, had his reception immediately after mine.

When the Prince came from his apartment, called, in the language of palaces, his CLOSET, into the entre rooms, I presented to him Mr. John Adams Smith, as public secretary of the legation, and Mr. Ogle Tayloe, as attached to it personally. Other special presentations took place; among them, that of the Prince of Hesse Homberg, by Lord Stewart, both distinguished in the then recent battles of the continent. The Prince Regent moved about these rooms until he had addressed every body, all awaiting his salutation. Doors hitherto shut, now opened, when a new scene appeared. You behold, in a gorgeous mass, the company that had turned off to the right. The opening of the doors was the signal for the commencement of the general levee. I remained with others to see it. All passed, one by one, before the Prince, each receiving a momentary salution. To a few he addressed conversation, but briefly, as it stopped the line. All were in rich costume. Men of genius and science were there; the nobility were numerous, so were the military. There were from forty to fifty generals; perhaps as many admirals, with throngs of rank inferior. I remarked upon the number of wounded. Who is that, I asked, pallid but with a countenance so animated? "That's General Walker," I was told, "who was pierced with bayonets whilst leading on the assault at Badajos,"—and he, close by, tall but limping? "Colonel Ponsonby; he was left for dead at Waterloo; the cavalry, it was thought, had trampled upon him. Then came one of like port, but deprived of a leg. As he moved slowly onward, the whisper went, "That's Lord Anglesea." A fourth had been wounded at Seringapatam; a fifth at Talavera; some suffered in Egypt, some in America. There were those who had received scars on the deck with Nelson; others who carried them from the days of Howe. One, yes one, had fought at Saratoga. It was so that my inquiries were answered. "All had done their duty;" this was the favourite praise bestowed. They had earned a title to come before their sovereign, and read in his recognition their country's approbation. The great number of wounded was accounted for by recollecting, that little more than two years had elapsed since the armies and fleets of Britain had been liberated from wars of extraordinary fierceness and duration in all parts of the globe. For so it is, other nations chiefly fight on or near their own territory—the English every where.

Taking the whole line, perhaps a thousand must have passed. Its current flowed through the entre rooms, got onward to the vestibule, and was finally dispersed in the great hall, where it stood in glittering groups and fragments. Those who composed them, found themselves there, by a course reverse to that of their entrance, and went away through the grand portico, as their carriages came up.

TO A BELLE.

Not for the smiles and bloom which thou art wearing,
As early life beguiles or charms thee now;
Not for thy reed-like voice, thy gentle bearing,
Thy golden tresses, or thy sunny brow:
'Tis not these witcheries that move my spirit—
(Though these thou hast, and richly,)—thus to play
With idle rhymes, thy memory to inherit
When here thine eye shall rest some future day.

No, friend of happy hours! This song is given,
A simple tribute to thy worth alone;
To recollections, sweet as dreams of heaven,
Fast linked with thee and thine, in moments gone:
They rise like flowers in spring-time, brightly glowing,
Or summer's morning light, on wave and tree;
Till warmest wishes from my heart are flowing,
That life's best joys may bless thy friends and thee.

THE PRIAR OF SAINT LUKE.

The Friar gently pulled aside the tapestry and entered. The Knight slept, in despite of the pain of the deep wounds on his breast and forehead, and yet it seemed the sleep of a troubled spirit.

Coldly and calmly at first the friar gazed upon the slumbering knight; suddenly, a gleam of light flashed across his placid and wrinkled countenance, and his deep blue eye gazed earnestly, and with something in its glance of mingled awe and surprise, upon him. "Holy Saint Luke," he exclaimed, half audibly, "can this—but no, no it cannot be."

Low as his exclamation was it awakened the knight. He turned anxiously around, as his eye fell upon the form and visage of the friar, in a low murmuring tone he exclaimed, "Sancta Maria, ora pro nobis,—who, who art thou?"

"A humble friar of the order of Saint Luke, come to admonish thee to prepare for thy departure from this world of woe. If thou hast aught, Sir Knight, which weighs heavily upon thy spirit; if thou hast done aught (as who of us has not) which requires expiation, confess I entreat thee, and be absolved."

"Holy father," returned the knight, "I have been a man of blood. I have fought in the battle field, when the voice of the infidel cried 'alla illa allah' in the fight; I have borne the banner of the cross to the walls of Ascalon; I have beheld around me, Christian and Infidel wounded and dying, beneath the rays of yonder sun, which shines alike upon Moslem and Frank; I have fought for the cross. Holy father, in the dread day of judgment will this avail me aught?"

"God only must judge of that, Sir Knight. If when you fought the infidel, and was solely and entirely for the glory of the only true God; if no vain passion for worldly fame, no earthly ambition bid thee draw thy sword, then mayst thou hope to find thy deeds in the right scale. God, who knows all things, and beholds each spring of action in the human heart, God only must judge of that."

The knight turned upon the friar a dark and troubled eye; a deep, awful groan burst from his bosom; he would have spoke, but the words died on his tongue.

"My son," continued the friar, "if I read ought of that groan and the fearful glance of thine eye, there are other things of which thou shouldst speak; ah, I conjure thee by thy hopes of heaven, by thy christian faith, conceal nothing from me, unbosom thyself to thy spiritual father."

A holy enthusiasm spread over the countenance of the man of mercy, and he spoke as a kind father would to an erring son; yet the knight turned and rolled on his wearisome couch, and his dark eye flashed with a mixture of pride and sorrow.

"Thou hast been in Florence, holy father?"

"'Tis now twice ten years, my son, since I beheld that city."

"Twice ten years," repeated the knight musing; and he bent another stern enquiring gaze upon the friar; the calm, placid look of the friar again quieted him, and turning away his eye, in a voice almost rendered inaudible by emotion, he said; "Then thou hast heard of the Lady Vincentea?"

Well was it, that the knight marked not the feelings which this question awakened. The friar for a moment lost all command of himself, seizing his missal with a grasp, more like the hand of a warrior on his sword, than a holy friar on his book of faith, he raised it in the air, and his eye flashed from beneath his bent brows, with a haughty and fierce glare; a word was upon his tongue, yet he spoke not; by a powerful effort he recalled his composure, and when the knight looked up for a reply, there was no vestage of the fiery passions on his brow.

"Methinks," said he, "I do remember, a lady bearing that name."

"Remember her, holy father! ah, who that hath once gazed upon her will forget her. Ye little rock, here pent up as ye are from the world, what love is, or what it can accomplish. Bend ye down here, or sit upon my couch, and I will tell thee a tale will move thy very soul. Yet tell me first, how came I in this monastery? I remember me of the fight, and of a stunning blow upon my helmet, yet more I cannot—all is dark and lacks remembrance."

"Thou wert found in the field by a brother of our order, senseless, yet breathing; before thee lay the bodies of three knights, mangled and bloody. Hence thou wert brought hither."

"Enough! I slew them all; yet I appeal to heaven for the justice of the cause."

"Sir Knight, thy strength is waning fast, thy tale"—

"I feel it all, holy father; scarcely another hour can I hope to live; nearer, nearer."

And the friar bent over the dying man, as he confessed.

"The Lady Vencentea de Vampt Bras, was my first and only love. Thou hast been in the world, holy father; thou hast seen her; perhaps thou hast loved some lady in vain; or thy love perchance has been requited, and some mischance has torn from thee thy bride—Nay speak not; thy eyes tell me thou hast. Then mayest thou form some idea of the deep engrossing passion which filled my soul. I loved her; I adored her; I would have died, rather than the ungentle blast of misfortune had blown upon her; she was beautiful. Her hair, dark as the face of night, flowed in beautiful ringlets adown her neck; fair and beautiful as the drifted snow was her gentle bosom, and her eyes, oh who could gaze upon them, and not be willing to forfeit his life for one bright glance of tenderness from them? But thou art cold, holy father, than heedest me not."

"Go on my son," said the friar, and again he bent over him.

"I loved her, and her own lips had told me that my love was requited. Yet we were too young then, to think of marriage, and in an unlucky day, boy as I was, I placed the cross of Christ upon my breast, and with the army of the good Saint Louis, set sail for the holy land. For five years I fought for the cross, and on the day of Acre, was knighted by the hand of Richard Plantaganet, in the field. The day of my return came round: with a heart full of love and romance, and of tender recollections I set sail for Florence. From that day, naught but evil overtook me. A storm drove us on the coast of Barbary, and we were overpowered by numbers, and captured. Ah! bitter, bitter were those days of bondage. The agony of separation, perhaps forever, from the dear object of my soul's affections; the horrors of captivity, the taunts, the bitter malice of our masters, were too much for human strength to support.

"One after another, my companions died around me, until I alone was left of all the noble hearts with whom I sailed from Palestine. My tyrants grew less and less watchful, and an opportunity at length offered to escape. I made good use of it, and the next day saw me at sea in an open boat, far out of sight of land, and with but an uncertain hope of being relieved from my perilous situation. Three days of suffering were past, and as the sun for the third time was approaching the verge of the horizon, I saw a ship bearing the colours of my own beautiful Florence, stemming the seas in her pathway towards me; my signal was seen, and I was taken aboard the friendly vessel, and in a few days beheld my native city.

"But, gracious heaven! what a tale was told me when I entered my father's mansion. But thy countenance changes, holy father, what is the matter that ye bend your brow?"

"Something of this, Sir Knight, I have heard before, and the memory is painful; but on with thy tale, I am calmer now."

"I was told, holy father, that my Vincenteo, her for whom my soul had pined during my absence; on whom my heart doted; that she, holy father, was married to another, to my bosom friend the Count Auselin of Florence. Oh, merciful Heaven! why, why did I not perish in the wilds of Barbary; why was I alone saved, to be made the tool of passion."

"Arraign not heaven, Sir Knight; man cannot conceive the purposes of the deity, and whatever he—is meant for a wiser end."

"I believe it, yet by my faith, 'tis sometimes difficult to quell the murmurings of my heart.—Under the dominion of what fiend I acted, I know not; but my thoughts, my purposes were deadly—I sought revenge, with the avidity of a devil; would I had perished ere I gained it. One night, my false love and my traitorous friend, were alone on the bay of Florence. They stood upon the beach, gazing at the beautiful moon, which cast a fitful light over the scene. I marked them well, and stealing behind them, I plunged my stiletto first in her back to the heart, and then in the bosom of the count, who turned round hastily to meet me. She fell with a smothered groan, but the count was not so easily dismissed. We struggled long, yet he fell, and muttering curses on me he expired. Merciful Heaven! what aileth thee, holy father."

A deathlike change came over the friar—he gasped for breath, and his hands were clenched in an agony of rage and grief.

"Inhuman villain!" he exclaimed, at length, "Thou then, wert the murderer! Thou it was who in that hour of sacred happiness stole upon me, and like a serpent murdered my love."

The friar sunk exhausted on the floor, for long abstinence had rendered him weak as a child.

"And thou," exclaimed the Knight, "who, who art thou?"

"Roger De Auselen," returned the friar.

"Roger De Auselen, living!"

"Aye, living; thy blow was strong, and the wound was deep, yet the Count De Auselen lived to end a life rendered miserable by thy villainy, in a monastery."

"And Arnulf, lived to pass a life of horrid misery in the battle field, seeking in vain for death. Roger De Auselen, by thy hopes of mercy, by thy former friendship, I conjure thee, forgive, forgive, the frantic deed of a man rendered mad by disappointed love. Oh dost thou know the feelings which passed through my bosom, when I beheld her, my only love, leaning with fond affection on thy arm, thou wouldst not think me so utterly a villain. Forgive, forgive me!"

"Forgive thee, Arnulf! may the forked lightning of Heaven blast thee—yet no, no, gracious God forgive me my implacable hatred. Sir Walter—I do forgive thee; and I pray Heaven may forgive thee;" and the count grasped the hand of him who had been his friend and a tear flowed down his cheek, and fell upon the hand he grasped.

"A tear, De Auselen," murmured the dying man, "nay, nay, this is too much."

The noble friends for a time in silence gazed upon each other. The awakened tenderness of other years struggled in vain for utterance. The pious resignation of the friar, and the deep and sincere repentance of the misguided man, who had wrought on himself and others such awful misery, were meet objects for the gaze of angels.

Death began to assert its sway over the knight; "my friend," he said, "my long lost, dearest friend, thinkest thou there is, in the mercy of Heaven, hope for a man so stamped with guilt as I am?"

"Heaven is full of love, Walter; and I do believe me thy repentance is sincere."

And the friar knelt over the form of the knight, and muttered ave and pater for the soul of his dear friend. A deep groan interrupted him and he looked upon the knight; his spirit had departed—God who alone knew his sincerity in repentance—only knows whither. But the soul of the friar believed it was to Heaven.

People who are not in the habit of looking into statistics, are not aware of the vast disproportion in the density of the population between the different sections of the United States. New England is far more densely settled than any other section of the country. In fact the population of Massachusetts, which, in this respect, far exceeds that of the other New England states, and many of the countries in Europe, even including some of those which have for centuries been considered populous kingdoms. Spain, for instance, has an average of but sixty-three individuals to the square mile; Scotland but seventy-one; Denmark but seventy-six; while Massachusetts has seventy-eight. We subjoin a list of the several states of the Union, with the number of the inhabitants to the square mile in each respectively, viz.:

Massachusetts has 78 to the square mile, Connecticut 63, Rhode Island 62, New York 44, New Jersey 38, Delaware 36, Maryland 35, Pennsylvania 29, New Hampshire 28, Vermont 28, Ohio 25, South Carolina 18, Virginia 17, Tennessee 17, Kentucky 16, North Carolina 15, Maine 12, Indiana 10, Georgia 9, Alabama 6, Louisiana 5, Illinois 3, Mississippi 3, Missouri 2.

WINDSOR CASTLE, ENGLAND.

DESCRIPTION.

There are few of our readers who have not often heard of the renowned stong-hold of British royalty, which is depicted in the present number. The historian and the poet, have recorded the deeds of its inmates, and arrayed before the imagination, its walls and its turrets,—its apartments, and groves, and gardens, until, like the Tower of London, they are familiar to Christendom. The muse of Shakespeare, of Gray, and numerous other bards of renown, may be said to have made these splendid demesnes a kind of public property, in which every reader, however remote, has an interest. A description of the castle, connected with the engraving, will therefore be deemed interesting and necessary.

Windsor, or, as it was anciently called, Windelshora, is situated at the east end of the county of Berks, on the banks of the Thames. The place was given to the Monastery of St. Peter at Westminster by Edward the Confessor. He kept it but a short time,—William the Conqueror exchanging for it certain mansions and lands in Essex, with the Abbot. William built a castle on the hills, which was afterwards much enlarged by his son Henry I., who encircled it with a wall, after erecting a chapel dedicated to king Edward, the confessor.

Though, inhabited frequently by succeeding kings, Windsor Castle did not attain to much grandeur until the birth of Edward III—the hero of Cressy—who destroyed the old fortress, with the exception of three towers at the West end, in the lower ward,—built the present fabric, and made it the seat of the noble Order of the Garter. Additions, improvements and alterations had been made in the building, from time to time, during succeeding reigns, particularly by the Henry's VII. and VIII. by Queens Mary and Elizabeth, and Charles. Superb repairs and beautifying proceedings have taken place in the reigns of George III. and IV.

The interesting points of the castle are the Terrace, on the north side, made by Queen Elizabeth, and carried round the east and south side, by Charles I.; the Round Tower, or Keep, and St. George's Chapel. The Terrace is 1,900 feet long, and is perhaps the finest promenade in Europe. The prospect from it is thus described by the gallant and faithful Camden. The improvements since his time, however, in the prospect, will make his description applicable only to the country itself:

"For, from an high hill, which riseth with a gentle ascent, it commandeth a most delightful prospect round about; for right in the front, it overlooketh a vale, lying out far and wide, garnished with corn fields, flourishing with meadows, decked with groves on either side, and watered with the most mild and gentle River Thames. Behind it, arise hills everywhere, neither rough nor over high, attired as it were with woods, and even dedicated, as it were by nature, to hunting and game."

From the top of the Round Tower, the constable's residence, twelve counties may be plainly seen. Here the Earl of Surry was confined, and composed some of his most beautiful songs. Two chapels have been built on the site of the original one dedicated to the confessor—the last St. George's—a splendid edifice, by Edward IV. A large tomb-stone, intended by the ambitious Woolsey, as a receptacle for his remains, was converted, in 1649, into a Royal Cemetery.

Windsor Castle, though the residence of many monarchs, has only been the birth place of two—its founder Edward III. and the ill-fated Henry VII. It has ever been greatly renowned by the institution of the noble order of the Garter by Edward III. Its exact origin is unknown, but the power which it has embodied, and the ambition it has excited, are beyond estimation. Only one knight of that order was ever degraded—viz: Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk. He was accused of treason, and disgraced in Henry the VIII's time,—but was restored to the order by Queen Mary.

The little park, on the east of the castle, is four miles in circumference. Herne's oak, the tree immortalized by Shakespeare, which stood in it, was cut down several years ago. The Great Park now contains about 1600 acres in park only—the rest being arable land. The royal domain of the Forest is fifty-six miles in circumference, and includes within it about twelve whole parishes and parts of others.

Such is a rapid but accurate sketch of this celebrated place. It is not so much on account of the "royal dames and kings of ancient long," who have nestled there, and wielded the sceptre of dominion, as it is from the charm of poetry, and romance, which has been thrown about it that Windsor Castle will be remembered. But while Jack Falstaff, and the Merry Wives are seen laying rounds—while the ivy in Eton College continues to stir the heart of man with boyish feeling—while the sweet music of Surrey's lyre continues to echo,—we cannot fear that Windsor will be forgotten. It will arise upon the view of coming ages, surrounded by the undying lustre of history, of legend, and of song.

MADNESS.

Swell the clarion, sweep the string,
Blow into rage the Muses' fires,
All thy answers, Echo, bring,
Let wood and dale, let rock and valley ring,
'Tis Madness will inspire.

Hail! awful Madness, hail!
Thy reaches extend, thy power prevails
Far as the voyager spreads his vent'rous sails,
Nor best nor wisest are exempt from thee
Folly, Folly's only free.

Hark, to the astonish'd ear
The pale conveys a strange, tumultuous sound—
They now approach, they now appear,
The nor leads her chorus gear,
And demons dance around.

Pride—ambition silly vain,
Revenge and malice swell her strain,
Devotion warp'd, affection cross'd,
Hope in disappointment lost,
And injur'd merit, with a downcast eye,
(Hurt by neglect) slow talking by
Loud the shouts of madness rise,
Various voices—various cries,
Mirth unmeaning—causeless moans,
Bursts of laughter—heart-felt groans,
All seem to pierce the skies.
Rough as the wintry wave that roars
On Thule's desert shores,
Wild raving to the unfeeling air
The letter'd maniac thunns mong,—
Rage the burthen of his song—
In rage he grinds his teeth and rends his streaming hair.
No pleasing memory left, forgotten quite,
All former scenes of dear delight—
Coine-bial love—parental joy,
No sympathies like these his soul employ,
But all is dark within, all furious black despair.
Who's this wretch with horror wild?
'Tis Devotion's ruin'd child,
Sunk in the emphasis of grief,
Nor can he feel—nor dares he ask relief.

Thou fair Religion wast design'd,
(Dateous daughter of the skies,)
To charm and cheer the human mind,
To make man happy, good and wise;
First shown by these, thus glow'd the gracious scene,
Till Superstition, fiend of sin,
Bade doubts to rise and tears to flow,
And spreads deep shades our view and Heaven between.
Drawn by her pencil the Creator stands,
His beams of mercy thrown aside—
With thunder arming his uplifted hands
And hurling vengeance wide.
Hope at His frown aghast yet lingering flies,
And dash'd on Terror's rack, Hope's best dependence lies.

CUSTOMS AND MANNERS OF PERSIAN WOMEN.*

This, we do not hesitate to say, is the most important work that has ever been published in the East. Whether it has been honoured with a royal or gold medal, does not appear; but that it contains more information respecting the state of society in Oriental countries, (which are all as much influenced by Persia as the continent was by France,) more solid wisdom, pure morality, and judicious rules of life, than any other profane volume of the same size, will not be doubted by those who read it. The false notions, in particular, which have prevailed about the "slavery" of women in the East, are completely blown away.

It seems that a royal commission was directed (we do not accurately know when, or by whom) to five ladies of distinguished breeding and quality, empowering them to draw up a complete code of laws for the women of Persia; and, in the prosecution of their labours, to call in, as often as their advice might be necessary, two other women of great distinction and learning to aid their deliberations; precisely as the judges are sometimes required to deliver their opinions to Parliament on difficult questions of law. The names of the first five are, Kulsum Naneh (President,) Shahr-Banu Dadeh, Dadeh-Bazm Ara, Bagi Yasmin, Khala Gul-bari. The assessors or judges are, Khala Ian Agha, Bibi Ian Afroz; And the work before us is the pandect of laws collected, arranged, and settled by them. As we proceed, it will be seen how erroneous were the opinions that regarded freedom, pin-money, separate maintenance, divorce, &c., as peculiar privileges of Western women. It will, on the contrary, be made manifest, that these have come, like the Cholera, Light, &c., from the East, and that the circle of a Persian lady's amusements, though the links may be apparently different, is as large as that of any woman of fashion here; while the tie of morality are equally strict in both countries. If the one has her private box at the opera, church, the race-course, the ball, the carriage; the other has her bath, mosque, litter, pipe, and Almehs, who dress and dance as voluptuously as Tagioni herself. But one circumstance deserves notice. The good treatment of women here is secured partly by sentiment, and partly by law. In Persia, besides law and sentiment, they have religion on their side. A man who abuses his wife is not only exposed to the tongues of all her friends, and a bastinado from the Kazi; but he is turned up at the day of resurrection, and lucky is he if his legs are able to carry him into Paradise. If we consider the nature of Al Sirat, it is evident that he must have great difficulty in keeping his footing upon that very narrow pass. The code (and it may be observed that its mere existence proves the great consideration of women in Persia) contains numerous enforcements of this great principle, some of which we proceed to lay before the reader, premising that there are four grades of obligation mentioned. Wajib, necessary, mustahab, desirable, sunnat, according to the law and traditions of the Prophet, and sunnat Muakkad, an imperative duty of religion.

IMPERATIVE RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WOMEN.

"1. A husband should give his wife money without limit. Allah forbid that she should die of sorrow and disappointment! to which case her blood would be on the head of her husband. The learned conclave are unanimous in declaring that many instances have occurred of women dying from the barbarous cruelty of their husbands in this respect, and if the husband be even a day labourer, and he does not give his wages to his wife, she will claim them on the day of judgment. It is incumbent on the husband to bestow on the wife a daily allowance in cash, not yearly or quarterly, but daily,—this is a decided improvement on pin-money; and he must also allow her every expense of feasting, and of excursions, and the bath, and every other kind of recreation. If he has not generosity and pride enough to do this, he will assuredly be punished for all his sins and omissions, on the day of resurrection."

This is not all. He is accountable, not only for his own soul, but his wife's. As in this country, so in the other world, any debts she contracts he becomes liable for, and they are exhibited on the debit side against him, upon the day of judgment.

"2. As long as he will not allow his wife the fees for the bath, and she is thus prevented from performing her ablutions, so long will fasting and prayer be of no use."

How pleasant it would be, if, on the eve of an Election, a cry of Attorney could be raised against a candidate, because he did not allow his wife a private box at the Opera? If Sir James Scarlet could introduce such a doctrine from Persia, he might then indeed pen his most addresses to the ladies of Norwich. How much the salvation of a Persian woman's soul depends on the due use of the bath, will be plain from the following extract. Particular attention is requested to the nature of the figures, especially to those of the sun, moon, and beasts. Had not the writer overlooked that essential point, we might have been spared his entertaining absurd remark, as he would have seen that the whole is religious in an extreme degree. The correct view is taken by the Wise Women.

"The Persian ladies regard the bath as the place of their greatest amusement. They make appointments for most there, and often pass seven or eight hours together in the carpeted saloon, telling stories, relating anecdotes, eating sweetmeats, sharing their helipoms, and embellishing their beautiful forms with all the fancied perfections of the East; dyeing their hair and eyebrows, and curiously staining their fair bodies with a variety of fantastic devices, not unfrequently with the figures of trees, birds, and beasts, sun, moon, and stars.

"3. On the last Friday of the blessed month of Ramazan, the women ought to dress superbly and perfume themselves, and put on their best ornaments, and go to the porticoes of the mosques; because young men of cypress forms, with tulip cheeks, and amorous demeanour, assemble there in greater numbers than at other places. There they must sit down and stretch out their feet, and every one must light twelve tapers; and in doing this, care must be taken to lift the hand high above the head, so as to raise up the veil, as if by accident, and thus display their beautiful faces. Their crimson-tinted toes must also be exposed, in order that the young men may see and admire them with wounded hearts; but it would be an unlucky omen if one of the tapers were left unlighted. Bibi Ian Agha, and the rest of the learned conclave, are unanimous in this opinion. Further, it is not at all necessary that, in lighting the tapers, silence should be observed. On the contrary, lovely women should always let their sweet voices be heard."

This must be understood to be an important religious ceremony. It will be rendered plainer presently.

"4. Should a favourable opportunity occur for the beautiful young girls to remain with the young men for a short time, and especially if their intercourse arises from mutual affection, there can be nothing wrong in the indulgence of their attachments. Indeed, it is a fortunate circumstance, and, upon the whole, more gratifying and satisfactory to them than fasting the whole year.

"5. And whenever the young women visit their female friends upon that blessed day, for the purpose of meeting their lovers, they may be permitted, without any violation of decorum, to remain till a late hour."

The love here meant is Platonic love.

"6. If a woman's husband presumes to ask where she has been, and why returned so late, it is highly reprehensible on his part; for, through the sacred influence of that blessed day, she stands acquitted of all impropriety."

"7. Dadeh-Bazm Ara, Bagi Yasmin, and Shahr-Banu Dadeh, are of opinion, that when a woman applies the end of a taper to the tips of the toes of her right foot, and, at the time of lighting it, displays the beautiful shape of her leg, she will undoubtedly be in no danger of hell-fire."

The Seven Wise Women are careful to lay down axioms, as the ground-work of their reasonings on every subject. The preceding is one.

"8. And Kulsum Naneh, the President of the Council, is decidedly of opinion, that no woman can entertain the least hopes of heaven, whose husband forbids the things that are herein commanded, and considered proper for her pleasure and happiness in this world. For, with what comfort (it is logically and forcibly asked) can a woman remain in the house of her husband, who is continually opposed to those recreations to which her whole soul is devoted?"

This, to us, seems conclusive. Indeed, the husband who can digest so powerful an argument, must have a stomach at least equal to that of an ostrich. But the Learned Women leave no loophole for escape.

"9. Dadeh Bazm Ara says, I have proved, from the instructions of my master Ibbis, (a great eastern philosopher, not to be confounded with Ebbis, Satan,) that the man who does not allow his wife to visit holy places and mosques, and the house of her friends, male and female, and who prohibits other innocent and agreeable proceedings, such as we have deemed proper and expedient for her own satisfaction and comfort; that man, I say, will be damned hereafter."

Nothing can be more clear or satisfactory than this. The crimes, however, of the husband, do not escape punishment in this world:—

"Should his wife die of a broken heart, he and his relations are liable to pay the expiatory mulct, as in cases of wilful murder."

This great right of women to innocent amusements is further insisted on; and the precise mode of the husband's perdition explained, in another article of the code. It appears that he is to be accused and condemned at the day of resurrection, by the Seven Learned Women.

SCIENTIFIC DIVISION OF MEN.

The proper Man, the Half Man, and the Hupul-hupla.—"There are three sorts of men: 1. A Proper Man; 2. Half a Man; 3. A Hupul-hupla. A Proper Man at once supplies whatever necessaries or indulgences his wife may require; he never presumes to go out without his wife's permission, or do any thing contrary to her wish."

It strikes us, that this is the character, which, in these countries, is called "A Jerry Sneak." In the East he seems to be held in high honour.

"2. Your Half Man is a very poor, shivelling wretch, always meddling, with but little furniture in his house, and just bread and salt enough for bare subsistence; never on any occasion enjoying the least degree of comfort. The wife sits in his house, and works, and all she earns is applied to procure food and light. It is, therefore, weak in that industrious woman to reply harshly to whatever he says; and if he beats her, it is wajib to bite and scratch him, and pull his beard, and do every thing in her power to annoy him. If his severity exceed all bounds, let her petition the Kazi, and get a divorce."

These rules carry on them such a stamp of wisdom and reasonableness, that it is unnecessary to express our cordial concurrence in their perfect propriety. There can be little doubt that they will soon be used to enrich the law of Doctors Commons. And to whom can the task of improving the social condition of our countrywomen be more safely intrusted, than to the man who had struggled with such purity of motive, for the happiness of the women of India—Dr. Lushington? The right side of the question, important as it is, may, without hesitation, be confided to him, unless he get money to advocate the opposite side.

It would be unjust to omit noticing the judicious mode in which the Seven Learned Women direct a wife to resist her husband. We alude more particularly to the application to be made to the kazi. In this point, Eastern women have a decided advantage over the women of the West. For here, unless a woman's husband happen to wear large whiskers, there is nothing on which she can fasten. Then the whiskers may be false ones, and as to mustachios, we are assured that they afford no grip whatever. But in the East, independently of the fact, that both hands may at once be clutched, and that with a powerful purchase, the beard is the seat of honour, and is looked upon with profound veneration by both sexes. Without a large black beard, a man is nobody; he is a being whom, as Hajji Baba says, "a hundred dogs may make a corner stone of, and bring their friends." The respect in which any individual is held, varies in the compound ratio of his own length, and that of his beard. Maidon, in his very instructive and amusing travels, tells of a French serjeant-major, who, by a portly person, and a huge mane to his chin, obtained great consideration in Constantinople. He was an Effendi, a Pessa, a sultan, to them. As soon as Napoleon's career of victory in Egypt commenced, the most extravagant stories were circulated about his stature and his beard. The Turks declared that he was a giant, with a beard as large as the three tails of a Bashaw and, accordingly, they resolved to submit to such a Child of Destiny, but as soon as they

Omnibuses are now the order of the day. In addition to those under the proprietorship of Admiral Reynolds, and of Messrs. Aaron & Ward, Mr. Daniel Aim, an enterprising and praiseworthy gentleman, has lately put several fine teams in operation, two of which, the Union and Independence, ply hourly between the Navy Yard and Kensington, via the New Exchange; a third, the Stephen Girard, and the gayest of them all, leaves the Northern Liberties Free Admission News Rooms, 212 North Third street, every hour of each afternoon for Fairmount.

Baltimore, it is said, is flourishing beyond example. About 1500 new houses are building there this season.

Great as this increase is, we imagine it is far short of the amount of buildings being erected in Philadelphia during the present year, from a cursory observation of the blocks and single buildings now in progress. We should like to receive an approved estimate of the number from some of our practical builders.

We regret to state, that the son of a highly respectable gentleman of this city, expired on Wednesday last, near Frankford, from that horrible malady, hydrophobia. He was bitten by a dog, not known at the time to be mad, about nine weeks ago; and a few days since, the effects of the wound began to appear. Every remedy proved unavailing; and the unhappy lad expired in all the painful symptoms of one of the most afflicting diseases to which humanity is subject.

PHILADELPHIA & TRENTON RAIL ROAD. This highly important work, says the Commercial Herald, is progressing with unexampled rapidity. The whole distance is 26½ miles. The grading for a double track was commenced in the latter part of April, and the enterprising contractor, Richard Morris, has already completed upwards of 15 miles. No doubt is now entertained that the remaining portion of the grading, and all the bridges and culverts on the line will be finished this season. The laying of rails has been commenced at Morrisville and Bristol; a single track connecting those points, (about 9½ miles,) will be ready for use by the 1st of October. About one mile is already laid. The superstructure is of wood, of the best quality, laid on coarse gravel, with 2½ by ⅝ rolled iron plate rail. The construction of the superstructure varies somewhat from the mode in common use. The transverse sills are of the best white oak, 4 by 8, laid flatwise; and instead of being notched, a cast iron chair secured to them, receives the longitudinal yellow pine rail, which is kept firmly in its place by a spike on the one side, and a thin edge on the other. The plan is highly approved of by good judges who have examined the work. The cost has so far been within the original estimate.

The Franklin (Pa.) Democrat mentions that, on Monday last, a most unfortunate affray took place on the French Creek line of the Canal, between the aqueduct and the mouth of Little Sugarcreek. A party working on the line had become dissatisfied with another party, and meeting two of them, attacked them with stones, clubs, &c. and drove them off, but pursuing after, overtook one of them and hit him with a stone in the cheek, and kept him under water until he was drowned. Pursuit was immediately made, and seventeen individuals arrested, and lodged in the Meadville jail for trial.

Gimlets.—The yankees are in a fair way to destroy John Bull's gimlet trade with this country. The new twist gimlet is almost as much superior to the old English gimlet, as the screw auger is to the old pod auger. There is a gimlet factory at West Whately, which employs fifteen hands, about half of them females, and manufactures twenty five gross per week. The steel is imported from England in round rods; the handles are turned out in the vicinity. There is a gimlet factory at Plainfield, one in the northern part of Franklin county, one in Keene, N. H. and one or more in Connecticut.

A little girl who had been advertised so last some time since, in Alabama, has been just discovered. She had been stolen away by some villain, who coloured her face and disguised her so successfully, that he was enabled to sell her as a negro slave; but the purchaser soon found that the hue, at sale, was not of the true born flesh colour. The deed is one of the most ingenious villany.

A woman one hundred and three years of age, was on Friday taken up, in New York, under the vagrant act, and sent to the Alms House for the term of six calender months. The Courier and Enquirer states, that she has recently been living at 127 Mott street, whereto she was in the practice of going out to beg. Her appearance always produced her money, with which she invariably got drunk. On several occasions last winter, it became necessary for the watch to remove her from the street while in that state, to save her from perishing.

A great Day's Work.—The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, on one day last week, transported from Carbondale to Honesdale, over their rail-road, three hundred and sixteen car loads of coal, containing two and a half tons each, which amounts to seven hundred and ninety tons, and estimating it at the low rate of $6 per ton, equals four thousand seven hundred and forty dollars.—Northern Sun.

The Pittsburg Gazette states that, on Tuesday last, a Mrs. M'Sheffery was riding in a sleighbeds from East Liberty to Lawrenceville, and, near the United States Arsenal, as the carriage was descending a hill, it ran against the heels of the horse, which caused him to run away and upset the sleighbeds. Mrs. M'Sheffery had her neck dislocated by the fall, and died instantaneously; the driver was also seriously injured, and his recovery was considered doubtful.

Hail Storm.—A severe hail storm was experienced at Quebec on the 27th ult., by which 8 or 12,000 panes of glass were broken, and twice in the neighbourhood crops were cut down by the wind. Two barns were burnt and twenty-two sheep were killed by lightning during the same storm at St. John, Port Joli, and at St. Gervais the whole of the grain which was in ear, to the extent of a league and a half, was ruined.

In our late Paris papers a new octavo is announced, under the title, Exposition des Principes du Gouvernement Republicain, tel qu'il a été perfectionné en Amerique. Exposition of the Principles of Republican Government, as it has been improved towards perfection in America, by "Achille Mont, citizen of the United States, and former Prince Royal of the Two Sicilies."

Very Good.—The President and wife visited the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, while at Hartford. The pupils performed their exercises to the gratification of the company. The Vice President was introduced to a young lady from Albany, and had some conversation with her on the black board. Among other questions, he asked her age. With a roguish expression of countenance, she quickly wrote, "Are you married, sir?" Mr. Van Buren is a widower, and her reply raised a laugh at his expense.

The following characteristic anecdote is given of the veteran defender of liberty, in a late French paper:

"A few days ago, Gen. Lafayette and Count Possi di Borgo, met to sign as witnesses to a marriage contract. The General signed first, and on handing the pen to the Russian Ambassador said, 'I imagine, Count, this is the only treaty we shall ever sign together.' 'Who knows?' said the Count. 'God grant, then,' replied the General, 'it may be the treaty declaring the independence of Poland.' The diplomatist had no more, and here the colloquy ended."

Politeness of the Paris in the West.—A Kentucky paper thus speaks to and of a contemporary and neighbour:—

"Is he waiting for an excuse to call us to the field? We can furnish him with none whatever, further than to pronounce him, as we do most sincerely, and with an especial regard to the meaning of our words, a dunkard, a liar, a puppy, and a most redemptionless scoundrel."

The United States ship Delaware has arrived off Sandy Hook, having touched there on her way from Norfolk to the Mediterranean, to take on board the Hon. Edward Livingston, appointed Minister to France, and suite. Mr. Livingston arrived in the city of New York, on Wednesday evening, from his country seat at Red Hook. A letter from the correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, giving an account of the President's journey to the Rip Raps, for the benefit of his health, mentions that on finding the Delaware set in the Roads, "he did not attempt to conceal his displeasure, and said Mr. Livingston ought to have been in Paris at least two months since." We presume, however, that no fault rests with Mr. Livingston.

A candidate for office in Missouri, in an election-eering paper says:—"By nature and by habit, I am temperate and sedate; my constitution and faculties are unimpaired; my circumstances, though humble, are yet independent; my calling is that of a farmer; I reside in the county of St. Charles, and I am married." The qualification of the lady to be the wife of an accomplished a gentleman, should have been stated also.

Men Volcanoes.—Captain Alexander, an English traveller, gives the following account of mud volcanoes at the south west end of the Island of Trinidad. He also says they are found in the southern part of Russia in Europe.

"On this cape is an assemblage of mud volcanoes of which the largest may be about 150 feet in diameter; they are situated in a plain, and are not more than four feet elevated above the surface of the ground, but within the mouths of the craters boiling mud is constantly bubbling up. At times the old craters cease to act, but when that is the case new ones invariably appear in the vicinity. The mud is fathomless, yet does not overflow, but remains within the circumference of the crater."

A dead whale has recently been towed into Gloucester, Mass. which met its death by one of Dr. Sewall's torpedos. Some of the marks are visible, and go to prove the success of the Doctor's submarine weapon. It is to be hoped that the pursuit of the Sea Serpent will not be abandoned, as such a hoax as that would be in itself, a monsoon. Dr. S. is supposed to have mistaken the whale for the serpent; probably from its great length, which measured fifty feet, while its thickness was ten. It has been cut up, but it is not expected to yield much oil, the carp do having contributed it all, in its usual fashion.

Epitome of the Times.

Upwards of 137,000 tons of coal have reached Philadelphia from Pottsville and its neighbourhood during the present season.

On Sunday afternoon last, a gentleman residing in ninth Fifth street, during a temporary fit of delirium, swallowed about two ounces of laudanum. Dr. Bunley being called in, applied the stomach pump with entire success; and notwithstanding the large quantity of poison swallowed, the gentleman is now out of danger from its effects.

A fine of twenty dollars was lately imposed by a magistrate in this city upon the driver of a wagon, for wantonly obstructing the passage of a lady and gentleman on horseback. He had crossed the road, without any apparent reason, and placed himself directly in the way of the others, who came pursuing the right hand track of the road.

The statement made in some of the daily papers, that Mr. Avery was in this city, visited a camp meeting in the neighbourhood, and proceeded to Germantown, are entirely untrue. Mr. Avery has not been near Philadelphia, since his acquittal.

A British sailor belonging to the brig General Brown, lying near Race street wharf, fell overboard on Friday morning last, and was drowned. The body rose yesterday afternoon; a coroner's inquest was held, and a verdict returned of "accidental drowning."

An English emigrant recently sued the agent of the Liverpool line of packets, for the non-fulfilment of a contract, and recovered $16, with six cents cost.

Cholera.—A boy about eleven years of age, was taken to the hospital, yesterday, in the last stage of collapse. He died in a half an hour. We have heard of no other case since we last noticed this matter.—Pitts. Gaz.

In the Pittsburg Gazette—now, by the by, a neat daily paper—a scheme is advocated for connecting that place directly with Lake Erie. The mode proposed is by rail-road or canal, to the Ohio Canal, by which it is thought that the trade, via Cleveland, can be brought to Pittsburg.

A meeting was held at Augusta, Georgia, on the 20th ult. for the purpose of forming a company to establish a rail-road between that place and Athens.

Great Fire at Oswego.—A slip from the Assistant Post-master at Oswego, dated Aug. 2, 8 o'clock, A. M. and published in the Albany Argus, says, "The post-office at Oswego, together with one whole block of stores, were burnt last night. The fire took in a blacksmith's shop."

Foreshortened.—Bridges had just killed and weighed a fine pig, which he suspended from a limb of an apple tree near the stile, when a neighbour passing by, inquired the weight of his pig. "Well, it don't weigh as much as I expected, and I always knew it wouldn't."

Animal Remains.—The bones of a large animal—probably the mammoth—have been discovered near the river Don, in Upper Canada. They were embedded six feet deep in clay. The weight of a single tooth is three and a half pounds, and the other relics are of a size to correspond.

Trouble in Brazil.—It is reported, with every appearance of probability, that the Brazilians had risen on the British merchants, and massacred about fifty. It was said that the difficulty arose from a difference in the currency of money.

The ship Majestic, at Charleston, spoke on the 28th ult., off Cape Florida, the brig Fortune, three days from Havana for Castine, Me., the captain of which reported that when he left Havana the cholera and yellow fever were raging in that city to an alarming extent.

AMERICAN SATURDAY EVENING POST.

PHILADELPHIA:

Saturday, August 10, 1833.

☞ We have to apologise for the numerous errors in the first edition of this paper, of last week, in consequence of the unavoidable absence of the publisher.

☞ Accidents, in this city, to workmen engaged in the erection of new buildings, are not frequent, but the loss of limbs and life, has often occurred to a fearful great. The slow and dangerous practice of conveying materials to the upper stories of a new edifice, by means of the hod, is still pursued in some instances, but in a majority of cases the windlass is now employed. This agent, we believe, can be used in almost every case, and though attended with rather more expense, its advantages offer more than a compensation. Under any circumstances in the erection of all new buildings, there is more or less liability to accident, but by proper caution on the part of the employers, and carefulness on the part of the workmen, the business of the carpenter and mason, may be made as safe as that of any other mechanic.

In the erection of scaffolding around a new building, there is sometimes observed the most wanton carelessness. Accidents are generally to be traced to this cause. In conversing with an intelligent mechanic, on this subject, it was mentioned to us, that recently in removing the cross plank which supported the floor of a scaffold, at the fourth story, it was found to be secured by a single nail only! Upon this frail support, several workmen had risked their lives.—Their preservation was regarded as miraculous.

A new Fire Engine, designed for the use of the members of the Phœnix Hose Company, of this city, is now in the course of construction at Mr. Joel Bates' establishment, in Drinker's Alley. It is in the hydraulic form, but the carriage, it is believed, will combine many advantages over that now in use by the company. The engine occupies the centre of the carriage, leaving sufficient room at each end for a small reel, capable of containing about two hundred feet of hose, which will be used for conveying water from the carriage to the fire. The finish of the carriage, will be decidedly superior, and the running gear is constructed on an improved plan, giving great facilities in the movement of the apparatus. The power of the engine, it is intended, shall be sufficient to force water to the distance of 170 feet. With this carriage the company design also to use a tender, with seven or eight hundred feet of hose.

The Case of Thos. S. Hart, of Bustleton.

Mr. Manson, who, with his son and son-in-law, was lately charged with committing a desperate assault on Mr. Hart, of Bustleton, has called on us to complain of the great injury and injustice done him, by the exaggerated and erroneous reports in the newspapers, in attributing to them such brutal violence, by which their reputation is materially injured—they being condemned by popular rumour, before they have any opportunity of proving their innocence. We regret to say, that we have been partly instrumental in this prostration of their character, by coinciding with the statements that have appeared in the city papers. We consider Mr. Manson entitled to a hearing, as an act of justice, since the charges and testimony are, as yet, altogether ex parte. It appears that there has been an animosity of many years' standing betwixt the parties, aggravated by law suits, and acrimonious passages between them, in which Mr. Manson asserts that he has had a full share of injury and suffering.

Mr. Manson asserts that he is ready to prove that both himself and son were in their own houses at the time of the injury inflicted on Mr. Hart—who was not so dangerously wounded as represented—but was pursuing his usual avocations while the papers were representing him as dangerously ill and speechless.

The preparatory school of Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pa. is now open for the reception of pupils. The Classics, Mathematics, and the various branches of an English education, such as grammar, reading, arithmetic, geography, &c. are taught, in order to fit the scholar for early admission into College. The price of tuition is $6 per quarter, the pupil furnishing his own books. Boarding, including washing, fuel, light, &c. may be obtained in respectable private families for $2 per week.

Carlisle is one of the most healthy and pleasant towns in the state. The society also, is celebrated for its sociability and intelligence, and altogether as a place of residence, we know of no situation more delightful. The preparatory school of the College, is under the direction of able and experienced teachers, and we can confidently recommend it to the attention and patronage of all who are desirous of procuring for their children a good education, on very reasonable terms.

Dickinson College, it will be remembered, is under the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church.—The College will be opened, it is probable, as soon as the pupils of the preparatory school are prepared for admission.

We have recently been shown some very handsome specimens of American hardware manufacture, from Messrs. Whitney & Co.'s establishment, at Bridgeton, N. J. The knives, hatchets, and axes, are handsomely finished, and bear a beautiful polish. The articles made at this establishment, which is quite extensive, are reputed among the best manufactured in any part of America. Success to American industry!

We learn from the American System, a newspaper published at Princeton, N. J. that Mr. Edward Hopper, of this city, is now engaged in taking down the proceedings of the Quaker trial, at Trenton, with a view of publishing a fair and impartial report, on its close. Mr. Hopper is a careful and experienced stenographer, and will no doubt, in his report, render strict justice to all the parties concerned. There are one or two other reporters, in attendance at Trenton, who publish brief sketches of the debates and proceedings, as the trial progresses.

A Camden (N. J.) paper mentions that a machine, promising great advantage to Coidwamers, has recently been invented by Messrs. Gerhard and Vanneman, of that city. It is constructed on a plan which will not conduce greatly to the health, comfort, ease and profit of the operator, who can sit or stand by it at work, in any position. A person without feet or legs, can perform his task with equal facility as those who have these members, hitherto indispensable in the business. And it is alleged, by one who has been for some days using the machine, that nearly, if not twice as much work can be performed with as without it, in a given time.

The invention is now under exhibition at the Hall of the Franklin Institute.

The ladies of Mount Holly, N. J. intend holding a fair, on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 13th and 14th inst., for the purpose of procuring funds to build a house for the accommodation of the Sunday school.

A young woman in New York, who had been injured by a laborer on the rail-road—a married man—attempted to commit suicide on Tuesday, by taking laudanum. Failing in this, she feigned sickness, and sent for a physician, by whom she was bled. When the physician left her, she tore the bandage from her arm, and resisted all attempts to replace it, declaring it to be her intention to bleed to death. With great difficulty a straight jacket was placed on her, by which she was secured, and the arm tied up.

Dennis Stevenson, a laborer, in New York, on Saturday last, fell through a well hole, from the fifth story to the basement of a building in Mill street, on which he was employed. His collar bone was broken, and he is otherwise much injured by the fall. His escape from instant death, in falling from this extraordinary height, is accounted for by the ladder communicating to the different stories, being situated in such a manner as to break his fall in the descent.

It is said that by boring a hole in fruit trees, and filling it with flour of sulphur, all insects, bugs, caterpillars, lice, or ants, which prey upon the trees and fruit, will be effectually destroyed or expelled. The best time to apply it is when the trees are in bloom. The vital energy of the tree and sap dissolves the sulphur, carries it into circulation, and volives in sulphuric gas, evaporating through all the pores of the branches, leaves and fruit. This gas is deadly poison to all insects and animals, it suffocates them or drives them away as soon as they begin to smell it; but no injury whatever results to the tree.

Mr. Taylor, the agent of the American Sabbath Society of New York, in journeying through that state, with the design of lecturing and imparting information to the people on the subject of Education. His labours will no doubt be attended with the happiest effects. The feelings of the community will be awakened to the importance of the subject—the liberal will erect schools, and the poor will send their children to be instructed.

A proposition of this kind was made in this city, some eighteen months since, to an Education Committee of Correspondence, emanating from a town meeting; but it failed for want of a proper spirit of enterprise among the people. A report on the subject was made to the committee in question, recommending that a gentleman properly qualified for the task, be employed to visit every town in the state, call meetings, address the people, and whenever possible, form schools, to be superintended by himself, until suitable teachers could be obtained. Had this plan, feasible in every particular, been vigorously prosecuted, incalculable advantages would have been the result. The failure of the project is the more to be regretted, as, at that time, the services of an experienced teacher and public speaker—the Rev. M. M. Carll,—could have been secured, it is believed, for such a mission.

Even at this late day, we believe, an agency of this character might be profitably formed. Among the people of the west there is an inertness, a lukewarm feeling, on the subject of Education, which must be removed before we can look with confidence for any decisive legislative movement. Representatives generally follow public opinion in important questions. If the people will, the legislator dare not disobey; hence it becomes every community to take the preparatory steps.

From western papers we learn that Colonel Dodge, Indian Agent, has accomplished the entire removal of the Winnebago Indians across the Wisconsin, in accordance with the treaty of last summer. During the payment of the Winnebago Indian Annuity, fifty barrels of whiskey were sold to the Indians, most of whom soon become intoxicated. During a quarrel which arose in consequence, an Indian woman and several children were killed. The Indian who committed the murder was immediately shot by order of a chief, called the Little Priest.

At the recent examination of the students of the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn. six young gentlemen were recommended as qualified to receive the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The examining committee report the situation of all the departments of the University as highly gratifying—indicating skill and energy on the part of the Faculty, and talent and application in the students.

With this University there is connected a Manual Labour Academy, to the occupations of which the students devote a portion of their leisure hours. Of the success which has attended this arrangement the committee speak highly. By connecting labour with mental study, the price of board to the pupil is reduced to about one dollar per week.

A statement appeared, not long ago, in the Washington Globe, the substance of which was, that Mr. Calhoun was the person who introduced into the Charter of the United States Bank, the clause respecting the government deposits. This is not the case. It was Mr. Daniel Webster who introduced, as an amendment, which was carried, the 16th section—viz: "That the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct: in which case the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order and direction."

The new Theatre, in Pittsburg, will be opened on the evening of the 2d September, under the management of Mr. Wemyss, late of this city. Among the performers already engaged, are Messrs. Scott, Parsloe, Forrest, Mrs. Knight, Miss Fisher, and the Hilsons.

The progress of civilization among some of the western tribes of Indians, seems to be steadily increasing. Mr. Armstrong, Choctow agent, has given notice in the advertising columns of the Little Rock (Arkansas) Gazette, that he will receive Proposals, through the Post-office at Nashville, until the 1st of September next, for the delivery, at the Choctaw Agency on the Arkansas, above Fort Smith, of 999 Looms and 999 Spinning-wheels, for the use of the Choctaws west of Arkansas.

Our readers will remember that we noticed, a few weeks since, the employment by government, of an efficient contractor, to remove the raft which has, perhaps for centuries, been accumulating in Red River, (Arkansas.) This gentleman has been prosecuting his labors with abundant success,—being enabled to remove about a mile of the raft per day. This raft,—which obstructs a river as noble as the Delaware, bordered by an Arcadia of wild fertility—is nearly eighty miles in length, and is in many places six or seven feet thick. It is formed of drift wood, underbrush, and of every thing which is cast upon the river, by accident, or by storms and tornadoes. In many places, trees grow from this mass, and flourish luxuriantly. The undertaking to remove the immense extent of dead wood and verdure, deserves to be rewarded by a fortune for the contractor. It is justly considered in the West, as an attempt of the greatest magnitude.

The charge lately made in the Globe, and reiterated in the New York Post, that the establishment of the National Intelligencer is owned by the United States Bank, is unequivocally denied, by the editors of that journal. The editors themselves are the sole and only owners, and no connexion between them and the Bank, has been of a character to justify the statements of the Globe. The Bank has loaned money to the proprietors of the Intelligencer, to enable them to obtain facilities in their business, but in no case has any loan been granted, without proper security. The following is the concluding paragraph of the refutation of the charge, made by the editors of the Intelligencer:—

"No. Let the Post be assured that the Intelligencer is neither bought, sold, nor purchasable. If it had been, generous bidders would have been found—we know where. The Intelligencer is as independent of the Bank, as the Bank is of the Intelligencer; and whoever says to the contrary, says the thing that is not."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Messrs. Carey & Lea, have just published the Military Memoirs of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, by Capt. M. Sherer. The work is embraced in two small, but neatly printed volumes. The sketch is well written, and contains much interesting political information, connected with the military history of Wellington. The work is regarded as authentic, and the incidents detailed, render it a highly instructive narrative.

A Treatise on the functions, disorders, and treatment of the Teeth, by James A. Pleasants, Dentist, of New York, has recently been published by Messrs. Crissy and Goodman, of this city. The work is designed for individuals and private families, and will no doubt be found of vast service in enabling persons with diseased teeth to adopt proper means for relief. The subject of teeth in general, seems to be ably treated, in language familiar, and free from technicalities. The Treatise is printed in a superior style of typography.

The Game of Life, by Letter Ritchie, which has just been published by Edward C. Mielke, at No. 181, Market street, possesses, in many portions, extraordinary interest. The tale is ingeniously managed, and the revelation of the plot is made at the proper point. This a merit which many modern novelists entirely lose sight of.

The second volume of Greenbank's Periodical Library has just been commenced. This work has increased steadily in public favour, and deserves the liberal support which is accorded to the enterprise. The number before us, contains a very judicious critique on the merits of Scott and Byron, and commences the Journal of an Officer employed in the expedition under the command of Captain Owen, on the Western Coast of Africa,—a work which has received more than usual complaisance from the critical world.

An appeal to the wealthy, ladies as well as gentlemen, on the subject of the employment of the poor, has just been published by that indefatigable philanthropist, M. Carey, Esq. It is comprised in twelve sensible Essays, written with the characteristic force and conciseness of the author. The appeal embraces a mass of facts and testimony, on the distresses of the working poor, which ought not to fail in calling public attention to the subject. We commend the appeal to the notice of the liberal.

QUAKER TRIAL.

To the Editors of the Philadelphia Gazette.

Trenton, Saturday evening, August 3d.

Mr. Wood continued his argument through the whole of to-day, and will most probably, speak until Monday evening, when he will be followed by our able and eminent U. S. Senator, the Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, who will close the argument on behalf of the Orthodox party.

Mr. Wood, in the course of this trial, has displayed great zeal and ability; and since he has argued the case, we see unfolded, some of the mysteries of this unfortunate controversy. Mr. Wall, on behalf of the Hicksites, certainly exhibited a powerful mind, great legal learning, and intimate acquaintance with the subject, and a specimen of eloquence, seldom surpassed in any of our Courts; but from him, we of course, had but one side of the subject, and since Mr. Wood has opened for the other party, we have a wider field for the exercise of our judgment. But from what we have heard, so far, we are by no means capable of coming to any definite idea of the merits of the respective parties; Mr. Wall's positions have not yet been overthrown, but we anxiously await the conclusion of the whole arguments, and then the claims of both parties will have been fully stated, and no doubt eloquently argued. It seems from what we have heard that the early Quakers, differed in their doctrinal views, as well as modern ones; for both sides seem to quote from their theological writings, with equal success, in the proof of what each considers to be doctrines of the Quaker Church. And to us, it would seem as though the same Quaker books contain sentiments somewhat at variance with each other. A principle, however, which, (to use one of their technicalities) is called, the light within, seems to have been universally adhered to as fundamental, by the ancient Quakers, and has called forth many essays and publications in its defence. We think no person could attend this trial, without gaining a pretty correct knowledge of ancient and modern Quakerism.

Mr. Frelinghuysen will probably commence on Tuesday. No doubt, during his, and the Honorable Samuel L. Southard's arguments, our Court Room will be filled to overflowing. Very respectfully, yours &c.

Trenton, Tuesday evening, Aug. 6th.

Mr. Wood closed his argument this morning, at 12 o'clock. In taking leave of his subject, he was strong, clear, and eloquent; and his conclusions are irresistible, granting him his premises. He spent the morning in expatiating upon the breaches of discipline and order, on the part of the Hicksites, in the establishment of their new Yearly Meeting; and pointed out to the Court what would be the consequences, if such a spirit of disorganization and reorganization, should receive the sanction of the Courts of this State.

Mr. Frelinghuysen commenced his argument this afternoon. He commenced by concurring with the gentlemen who preceded him, in their view of the great importance of the cause now before this honourable Court. He then endeavoured to give his views of the powers of the Court, in such cases as the one it was now hearing. Then he took up the subject of doctrines, and enlarged upon the idea which the other party adhered to, that the light within is a fundamental principle or guide, and laboured to prove that it was not considered by the early fathers in the church, as a sufficient dependance. He said that this light within is an ignus fatuus, which will lead to bewilder, and dazzle to blind. He was endeavouring to prove, when the Court adjourned, that the early Quakers held doctrinal views in strict consonance with the other denominations of Christians.

Mr. F. is rapid in his delivery, though very easy and truly eloquent in his style. He will probably finish by to-morrow evening, or Thursday morning, when he will be followed by the able and eloquent advocate for the Hicksite party, the Hon. Samuel L. Southard.

It is thought that Mr. Southard will occupy the Court until Saturday evening, or Monday morning.—The Court room, which is very capacious, is nearly filled. The galleries are occupied by ladies.

As to the result of this important trial, we cannot even conjecture; and so far as our intercourse with both parties will enable us to judge, we think that neither is very sanguine.

New York City Ordinances.—Among the ordinances recently adopted by the Councils of the city of New York, are the following:—For driving a horse through the city, over five miles an hour, a fine is imposed; for turning a corner off a walk; driving on the side walk; driving tandem; exposing a horse for sale in the streets; washing a carriage, or watering a horse at a pump; laying on the grass in the Battery or Park; injuring trees; selling water from a public pump; unscrewing a hydrant; ringing a bell on board a steamboat before sunrise; ringing at any time more than two minutes; blowing a horn; solicit passengers; swim or bathe in East or North River, from sunrise to 8 P. M.; fly a kite; fire a rocket, gun, or cracker; sell less than a thousand crackers in a lot; post hand bills for the cure of diseases; suspend signs into the street; sell earthen or tin ware in the public slips, &c. &c. &c.

Randolph, the fellow who attempted to nose Gen. Jackson, on the 24th ult. partook of a dinner tendered him by the citizens of Williamsburg, Va. as a mark of their respect, and in testimony of their indignant feelings at his persecution. A large number of toasts were drunk on the occasion, many of them highly complimentary to the guest, and some of them very severe on the President. The Richmond Whig publishes the official proceedings.

The Harrisburg Intelligencer complains bitterly, and with much apparent justice, that the public works of Pennsylvania are not managed and finished as they should be. It states that the representatives of the people have appropriated something like twenty millions, the annual interest of which at 5 per cent. is a million of dollars. It contends that the system of internal improvement has been conducted with imbecile and wasteful expenditure, the result of political favoritism. It expresses a belief, said to be held by nine tenths of the people, that one half of the sum expended, would, in better hands, have completed all the public works; that the Ohio canals cost only one fourth of the sum already expended by this state, and yet that the tolls on those works, in ninety days exceed those of a year in Pennsylvania; that the N. & York works cost less than one half as much as those of this commonwealth, while the tolls of the former in two weeks exceed those on the latter in one year. The same paper, in speaking of the rail road, adds, that bridges contracted for years ago, are still unfinished, and likely to be for years to come; the state paying, in the meanwhile, a million of interest annually; which in three years would be sufficient of itself to construct the entire rail road. Allusion is made to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, completed from tide water to the Potomac, yielding an income double the amount of the public works of Pennsylvania, although the cost is less than is paid in this state, during a single year for interest and repairs.

These are serious statements; and they come from a source which leads us to believe that they are but too authentic. It is not likely that the public mind will sleep on this subject, or that the legislature will be inactive in the matter, after such an exposition.

It is proper to subjoin in this place the amount of tolls received at the treasury from November last, to the 25th July, viz:—

1832—Nov.	$3,581 17	May	20,055 56
Dec.	11,124 33	June	15,783 79
1833—Jan.	5,991 36	July to 15th	14,582 30
Feb.	1,341 23
March	701 77
April	9,000 00	Total,	$81,582 73

It is proper to remark, that the tolls received at the Columbia and Philadelphia, for the month of July, have not been published, but they will be found very large.

A young rogue, under twelve years of age, was recently convicted, in one of the courts of London, of stealing a gold ring from a pawn broker's shop-window. He was sentenced to transportation. The following is a copy of a letter sent by the culprit to the court, while in prison, with a view of obtaining a mitigation of the sentence:

"To the Gentlemen of Chiver of his Majestyes Justice. For the Prisoner James Pollard. Gentleman on the 29 of August last had been of Anatomy for my Grammother in the Hothorne Street Lorrent Cocks to mean. And in my Return To The New Cut Now a Ladd I Found from the winder of pawnbroker And drop a Piece of Paper which I Unfortunate Picked up And in the same The Pawnbroker came up and Collard me And stroker me in the mouth And said I had stolenen a wing ham in Tyler Court of Anatomy for Bein committed on the 14 of Fryd last you may think I ham Guilty of the charge And A gainst me wich I admit you I ham not. Therfor I hope by the mercy of the honourable Court And in such mercy you will Take the Troubles of unfortunate Boy into consideration."

To Readers and Correspondents.

The Essays on the Worship of the Age, which our correspondent Marvin, proposes to furnish us with, are scarcely of a character suited for publication in our columns, if the first canto is a fair specimen of what the whole will be. The views of the author we take to be generally correct; but philosophic arguments on the subjects Milton has brought into discussion, are better calculated for the pages of a review than a newspaper. Canto 1st is therefore respectfully declined; though we cannot resist the inclination we feel to gratify our readers with the following illustrations of the author's power as a writer, and an acute reasoner:—

"There is infused in the minds of men an
Idea, that we are wise; now, wise in arts
And skillful as we are, and much as
We presume ourselves to know, one art we
Practise not—one noble art remains as
Yet unwrought—the art of living long!"

* * *

"Life is built; and to ourselves, in part, is
The honour given, of holding life and
Time together. Sad task, and hard—too much
For man's irresolute mind; and more hard
Than all the rest, which to abbreviate,
Its appetites or life; one must be cropp'd,
Or else the other glutted by that cause
Must cease. Be we beware of food that tempts our Taste, when we are not in want, and always
Cast a contemptuous eye on spirits as Drink. Who can forbear? I can't," &c.

A Fragment, by H. W. S., and Lines to S. E. G., of Essex, we consider unworthy of publication.

"Thoughts on the Literature of the Age," by A. L. M., will be published.

"Sorrow," by A., is on file for insertion.

"A Tale of '77," by J. F., and the "Sketch," by Cox, are well written, but deficient in incident. We regard both as unsuited for our columns.

The poem, entitled "A Sabbath Morning," by S——, and "Death," by Manson, are, on reflection, rejected. The first contains many good thoughts and flowing lines; but is, as a whole, too defective for publicity.

The piece of music—When thy bosom heaves the Sigh—published in the last number of the Casket, was erroneously credited to E. E. Marcy, Esq. The article which preceded it—The Ray—is Mr. Marcy's production.

A Mr. Murray, of Pittsburg, who began last year to bore for water on the south side of the Monongahela river, not far from the bridge, after attaining a depth of six hundred and twenty feet, has recently struck upon a body of salt water, which is said to be of force sufficient to rise thirty feet above the level of the earth. The water is strong; and it is estimated that fifty barrels of salt can be manufactured from it in the course of a day.

The time is not for distant, we believe, when the importation of salt, into this country, from any quarter, will be dispensed with. The discovery of new springs, and the increased use of the advantages offered by those already discovered, will obviate the necessity of using foreign salt, in any way. The immense springs, in the west of New York, at Onondago, and those in other parts of the country, increase yearly; and the trade to which they give rise, in one way and another, is almost inconceivable. The augmenting facilities of commerce in the extreme west, in the Territories, and by the Welland Canal with Canada, must continue to open a wide and extending field for the disposal of this commodity. There is a conservative principle about it, which enables the dealer to keep the money he has acquired, and to make additions to it continually. The success of numberless merchants in the business, will sanction the remark.

The bill for the abolition of slavery in the British West Indies, is still before the Parliament of Great Britain, where it is likely to remain, unacted upon. The great difficulty in settling the question, is the mode of compensation to the slave holders, for the loss of their property. The sum of £15,000,000 is now proposed as a gift to the masters, for an unconditional surrender of all their slaves; but in the present embarrassed situation of the English nation, it is no easy matter to raise this amount by taxation. The London Examiner proposes that the church property shall be taken for the "Christian work" of paying for the freedom of the slaves. He thinks that this ought to be particularly acceptable to the clergy, and a safe way of avoiding their scruples on the score of "pious uses," to which church property is pledged.

A proposition to increase the postage on newspapers, passing from one state to another, is among the subjects recommended to the attention of the Ohio Convention of Editors, when it shall assemble. Such a measure, we trust, will find few advocates among the editorial corps of that state. If any change is desirable, it is that all postage on newspapers and periodicals shall be thrown off entirely, and the adoption of such a measure would do much for the promotion of general intelligence.

COMMUNICATION.

A tailor, calling himself William Renshaw, left Morgantown, (Pa.) on the 26th of June last, leaving unpaid his boarding, shop rent, and various other accounts. He was also entrusted with a sum of money to purchase some articles in Philadelphia—whither he went; since which time, no tidings have been heard of money or goods. As no doubt he will try his fortune in other places, the public would do well by having a look-out for said villain—standing five feet six inches high on a pair of landy legs, having a waddling gait, a peculiar gun when speaking, a love for the bottle, a high conceit of himself, a fondness for riding borrowed horses, and an inveterate hatred of hard or steady work. He passes himself for an unmarried man.

COMMUNICATION.

On the 28th (Sunday) of last month, with several other whites, I attended to hear a funeral sermon preached, in memory of a departed minister of the Methodist Society. That minister was born a slave. He was an unmixed descendant of the African race, and the far greater part of the congregation met to deplore his loss, were blacks. I did not expect display of oratory, nor was I disgusted by attempt at display—but in the many sermons that I have heard, not one seems to my memory to have so completely suited the occasion, and the auditory to which it was particularly addressed. The preacher was an aged black, who, for twenty-five years, had been the bosom friend and fellow labourer with the deceased. This preacher, in good language, painted out the benefits, here and hereafter, to be securely reaped from the labours of departed worth. He spoke of the example given them by WILLIAM WEBSTER, the departed teacher, he told them, and warmly told them, that to go and do likewise, was to ensure peace and good will on earth, and an inheritance of eternal duration beyond.

I know, and well know, the worth of the man whose example was thus placed before these unsophisticated, but acutely feeling people. It was an example that all might follow; and as far as real and fervent religion, genuine humility, honesty, temperance, and truth in word and deed could contribute to form and set forth an example, the life of William Webster was one of unremitting usefulness. This worthy man, after a painful sickness, found rest on the 31 of August, 1833, in his fifty-eighth year.

Well would it be for both races, white and black, if the sober industry, quiet habits, and real good moral virtue, which marked the conduct and conversation of his noble minister of peace, was more in practice. In his manner of thinking or speaking there was nothing of idle cant, every act and word evinced sound and rational principles. He is gone—peace to his memory: he lived not in vain!

TO Mr. F. G.

Your first conundrum, a LAMB, I define,
Your second, a NAME, good or bad;
And LAND is full plenty to back-hiding time—
But the same there's much LAND to be had.
A CELLAR will rent for a room under ground;
A DEAR for the article taken,
And soldiers move on by the BAND's martial sound,
Also well BARE by harpers harmless.
Yes, well BARE is BEAR, and DRUMS prove diseases,
As a mother to her child, as a MULE;
To excuse, or BLAME, would not over-well please
The man with same name or a fool.
An ever you make in the BLADE of your knife;
A battle BLADE is next seen;
With a CANE, to support old people in life,
While man is in the to be CLEAN.
If an error in this you chance to discover,
Work it out in the waters of CUMBERLAND river.

July 20th, 1852. VICH ALPINE.

For the Saturday Evening Post.

ENIGMA.

I am a character well known in England, and there are few, either high or low, rich or poor, that are not acquainted with me. I dwell cities and towns, and take up my abode towards the extremity of a village. I am a stranger to virtue and innocence, dwelling with the vicious and profane. In respectable society I am never admitted; but in a gang of gypsies and beggars I am a principal character, and without me smuggling would be nothing. I never appear in the day time, but in the middle of the night and late in the evening, and always in disguise. I am fond of gaming, and always end in cheating, stealing, and plundering. It is the opinion of Burns and Blackstone that I should be put in jail, but I am certain I was never there yet. From what I have said, you may suppose me some pickpocket or thief, but to prove that I am neither, I delight not in a crowd.

TOM SMITH.

IT'S ALL BY EYE AND THUMB.

Tom Smith—he kept a blacksmith's shop
Close by Bankside, but drank
Till he lost house and home, and then
He forged upon the bank.

One day as he was blowing up
His fire, it struck his mind
To draw a draft, and by that way
He thought to raise the wind.

Says he, "to strike while the iron's hot
Is best, with me 'tis neck
Or nothing now." He little thought
How soon he'd have a check.

Tom took a boat, and started off,—
That is, the boat took him;
And so he crossed the stream, he thought
"With me 'tis sink or swim.

"If they should pay it—what a treat,
If not, refused I must;
So, if a check they don't kick up,
They'll come down with the dust."

Turn at the Bank the check presents;
The clerks begin to grin;
And then, instead of getting notes,
He found they noted him.

"A forgery," salutes his ear,
From all of them at last.
"Your cheque is forged," said they, "but you
Are sure of being cast."

To Cape, the marshal, he's consigned;
Tom tried to break away,
But found he could not rope with those
There marshal'd in array.

With six offenders he was chain'd,
And fastened side by side,
He dream't not, when he crossed the stream,
Of going with the tied.

Four Tom was tried, and guilty found—
"Twas then he gasped for breath;
To prove his acting—one they found,
His own hand caused his death.

The judge told Tom, "He must be hang,
And to prepare in time"
So though he did not get the note,
He was favoured with a line.

And Tom was hang. Now let me quote
Byron, to end my song;—
For—"Tom's no more"—his lordship wrote,
"And so, no more of Tom."

HARD NAMES, ON THE YANKEE OUTWITTED.—A Yankee, being in company at a tavern in Albany, a Dutchman happened in, and enquired the name of the Yankee. I will bet you a bottle of wine, replied he, that I have the hardest name in the company. Done, says the Dutchman—what is it? My name, sir, is Brom, said he, exultingly. "Well den," rejoined the farmer, "your name is Brom, and mine is Hanen, (which was the case)—now pay de bottle." The Yankee remarked, that he was rather a hard concern, but that he was fairly beaten, and paid the forfeit.

John Wilkes was one of the ugliest of God's creatures. His squint was excessive, and his whole countenance most whimsically ill favoured. "Such an one is a good-looking fellow," said the bald and able agitator, "and my friends tell me that I am as ugly as the devil, but between the handsomest face and my own, I never found with any woman more than half an hour's difference."

IRISH ASSURANCE.—An Irish milkman was brought up to take the benefit of the Lord's Act. He was suspected of concealing his property, having given no schedule, though he was known at a not very distant period to have possessed some. He was asked by the counsel who opposed him, whether he had not some property, which he had omitted to insert in his schedule? "Do I look a bit of property," says he, "have I at all at all." Why, what's become of your furniture and your cows? Cows you were known to have, as you said milk." "Yes, I had," says he, "but I have none now." "Why, what have you done with them?" "I have sign'd away every thing I had." "How have you assigned them?" "I have made my seal, and given them all away." "What, are you a dead man?" said the judge. "No, please your honor," says Pat, "but I soon shall be if you take away every thing I have to live on from me." He refused to make any assignment or schedule, and was remanded.

A GOOD HIT.—Some persons being in conversation the other day on religious subjects, one of them remarked that a certain clergyman, who had been the shepherd of a flock, had become so haughty that he had ceased to know some of the members of his own church, because they happened to be poor. Another observed that he must be a singular shepherd not to know the "sheep" of his own flock. A little girl, about eight years old, who was present, busy at her play, replied, "Mamma, he ought to do as grand pa used to do with his sheep—paint their noses.—Portland Courier.

"BRANDY LEAVE THE GIRLS ALONE."—A correspondent of the British Naval Chronicle affirms that the musical bagnolo owes its origin to the law publicly bestowed on the late Commodore Barney, by the beautiful Queen of France, on the occasion of his visit to Paris, after his gallant exploits at sea, in the war of the Revolution. The maids of honour were all so eager to follow the gracious example of the Queen, that it is said the young American became henpecked an object of envy and dislike to all the lean monks at Court. The bagnolo was composed by an Irish officer who was present when the royal insolvency was exhibited.

ELEGANT EXTRACT.—A New York country editor, a few years since, described the arrival of Lafayette in the following terms: "The Gallic hero, mental pin a cheerful, led the van; the rosy morn bespeckled the orient clouds with effulgent glory—and the gorgeous sun, at last uprising, like a warrior from his repose, walked up into the sky, gilding the vast expanse of ether, and throwing his broad and splendid rays upon a long line of our brave wagons and chaises, filled with unfortunate, principally from our village."

REMARKABLE LOSS OF APPETITE.—"After many hours works," says Mr. Jones in the account of his ascension to the summit of Mount Blanc, "we came to the Grand Plateau. Here we breakfasted, but was surprised at our stomachs not having more hodges. Mounsy only eating a chicken wing, and me only eats all the rest. We had little need to eat—the mere ceremony part to go was to come."

GOODNIGHT SWEETHEY.—Capt. G——, who had, as it is called, been "cleaned out," (another term for losing without of his whole fortune) not long since at the "Bunkum Hell," died lately of a broken heart, and in extreme poverty. So desperate indeed was his poverty, that the persons under whose care he expired, thought it allowable to apply to "the chief" for the expense of burying him, but the answer was, "they had done with him."—Baptist paper.

HOUSE OF THE ANVIL.—A blacksmith of Milan has, to the comfort of his neighbours, especially the rich, successfully practised a very simple contrivance to deaden, in a remarkable degree, the loud noise caused by the percussion of the hammer on the anvil. It is merely to suspend a piece of iron chain to one of the horns of the anvil, which carries off a great portion of the sound usually produced.

A curious accident is related among the reports undertakers of the late Lord B. While still Mr. W., and famous for his bon mots, he was dining with a distinguished party, to whom a certain distinguished peer, not remarkable for his enthusiasm, related that "his servant had by his human physician nothing could induce him to eat the vivet broth to be procured at Passy." "Vyer broth!" reiterated Mr. W., "I thought it was only the New Zealanders who ate their dead!"

ANTIQUITY.—The female parade are excellently conducted. They afford, if not delicate, at least abundant figure; and the public and half public are quite free. The people of Antioch and Rome drink a great deal of tea, and the people of Athens indulge with cheap beverages they call Pythagoras, which, when not exceedingly expensive.

G. W. Carpenter's

Compound Extract or Syrup of PINK ROOT, (Spigelia Marilandica.) The most Natural Worm Destroying Medicine yet discovered.

THERE is no disease of so extensive a character among mankind, as those which are produced by Worms, and are the chief cause of Fevers, Bowel Complaints, and Chronic and Nervous diseases incident to childhood, which are generally treated as something else. It is a fact, that in a population, that thousands of children are swept off, or are rendered feeble, pale and emaciated, through the first stage of life, solely in consequence of the presence of Worms. One of the remedies made use of for this disease, are stronger doses of medicines of a poisonous character, which debilitate the system, and sometimes make the patient more dead than alive. Try Old or Worldwood which has been recommended and prepared at present by the faculty, is so disorganized by adulteration, or the perfect of infertility, that it is a matter of precidence whatever can be placed upon it. The Wormy Tree, as it is commonly called, compound chiefly of Pink Root, is made use of in our hands, and is a safe and sure remedy, that is in almost universal use, and there is no preparation of a compound form of extracts, which has obtained such a high level of by the faculty. The Pink Root is considered by all who are acquainted with its properties to be one of the safest and most effectual remedies. There is, however, considerable of that which is sold almost worthless, merely using but a small portion of the root, it also remains considerable care and attention in procuring its preparation, which is not generally the case manufactured with pharmaceutical preparations. Under these circumstances, G. W. Carpenter has thought it advisable to prepare an extract of the Spigelia, combined with several of the vegetable remedies most approved of, for the purpose are of the family, particularly those in the country, and he feels confident that it will be supported by those who are acquainted with its effects, whose composition is known, and can be procured by them in purity and confidence, and will be the means of putting down this pernicious disease, which often proves fatal to the unexperienced, and which are productive of serious evils to the community. This article will be carefully prepared of uniform strength, and can be administered in safety to persons under any circumstances.

Hearing Restored.

MR. PRINTER.—Would perhaps a file of old newspapers be collected the following piece, which he pleased to insert into your columns, and no doubt you will receive the thanks of many of your subscribers.

Extract of a letter to the Editor of a Washington paper.

Dear Sir—I have long been intending to write you about my affliction. I'll repeat and mention that I often lamented being so hard of hearing, and have often I was obliged to have a seat in the middle of the aisle of the church, in order to hear and sermons—but now, thank fortune, can hear as well as any one of them days gone another being, and well too—entirely cured. Remember the great cure of DEAFNESS effected by Dr. Phillips, in the Indian in Rittenhouse, Pennsylvania, a place famed for its female seminary and benevolent institutions and a place much resorted to on account of its healthy situation.

My friend, the above cathed man you know, has often been the subject of our conversation, and his medical talents, have resolved him to discover a remedy, and succeeded in the art of curing this affliction, when such affliction is owing to nervous weakness.

The remedy is not to be put into the ears, but is to be taken internally, and the principle of action, is to strengthen the whole nervous system.

The cause and substance of his doctrine and principle of cure is, "that most cases of loss of hearing, is owing to a weakness of the nerves of the ears, produced by a gradual loss of sight in some other method of the frame. Now, by strengthening the whole nervous system, these weak parts become invigorated and recover their power to act. Then people can hear hearing, and get they are eight years."

The operate to be the Doctor's principle, and indeed we wish both to say, that a more valuable one has not been in any medical publication whatever, and as I, (you know) have studied physic myself, though don't practice, my opinion may be allowed to have some little weight.

A number of our neighbours asked my advice, and immediately after Wade and had the remedy Rewarded he said "The benefit thereof they much heard, and all expense was only five dollars.

Thus my neighbors sent on, and in return received what was so much desired, and as a further gratification to their cousin, sent their usual business, and ate and drank our thing, during the time of using the remedy.

Tell Mr. Carroll that I shall shortly visit him and present my best respects to your lady and family, and with the assurance I remain your affectionate friend, C. SMITH.

Dr. Thos. White's Vegetable Toothache Drops.

THE only specific ever offered to the public, from which a permanent and radical cure may be obtained of that disagreeable pain, the toothache, with all its attendant evils; such as fracturing the jaw in extracting the teeth, which often proves more fatal than the toothache itself; and cold passing from the decayed teeth to the jaw, liable to the head, producing a rheumatic affection, with many other unpleasant effects, such as a disagreeable breath, foul taste in the mouth, &c. &c. all of which are produced from foul or decayed teeth. I am happy to have it in my power to offer to the world a remedy, that will not only remove the pain time out of mind, but preserve the teeth from further decay, and arrest the disease in such an age decaying and save not yet commenced aching, reduce the teeth to a healthy state.

CERTIFICATES.—Mr. Thomas White—I have the pleasure to inform you, that I have been using your Toothache Drops for some time, and consider them the best I have knowledge that I find them far superior to any thing I have ever yet known for that purpose. You are entirely safe in recommending them to the public, and I for one will do the same, because I have had, I believe your recommendation fully sustained of their merits.

I am well convinced that it will cure most cases of Toothache when it is timely and properly applied. I am not shy to say much at this time as to its preservative properties, but from what I have seen and know that it will cure, and preserved from decaying, and from a few weeks experience, I am decidedly of opinion that it will have a very lucrative sale, and rendering, as it does, a valuable service to mankind, I may prove a blessing to humanity, and advantageous to yourself.

I remain yours, &c. WM. L. A. BIRKEY,

Philadelphia, Feb. 1, 1852.

Baltimore, July 7, 1852.—Dr. Thomas White left with me some of his Vegetable Toothache Drops, and requested me to use it my practice—I accordingly did so, and gave it to a lot of my friends and some of them had been complaining of the toothache for more than three months, and out to the sea it has perfectly cured them. I am now fully convinced of its value, not only in curing the toothache, but preserving teeth from further decaying. WM. H. WHITTEMORE, M. D.

Alexandria, Va. August 30, 1852.—Thomas White—I procured some of his Toothache Drops with me, in order to try the virtue of the medicine, and I must say that there was any property in making the thing public. I have tried it on a lot of negroes, and have only failed in two instances, and these were more of a rheumatic affection of the jaw, than consequent on toothache, and on that account I think it was the failure. They in general are worth trial of every person who labours under that disease of the tooth. DR. W. JUDKINS.
